Join the audience to hear from our invited guest speakers Dr Petra Lietz, Principal Research Fellow and Mollie Tobin, Research Fellow on framework synthesis of evidence for educational policy.

“There is a global rise in the number of countries undertaking national as well as participating in regional and international learning assessments. Much of this growth has occurred among developing countries. Assessment programmes constitute a significant investment for these countries, and can have multiple purposes. Little is known, however, on how these assessments have affected policies and practice in developing countries.

In 2011, ACER was commissioned to undertake a systematic review of studies into the impact of large-scale assessment programs on education policy in developing countries with the Joanna Briggs Institute providing methods advice to the review. This presentation discusses the systematic review process as well as the main findings of the review.”
